

matters of forced disappearances. However, it is reiterated, its effectiveness will depend largely on the political will of the federal and state authorities in charge of implementing, establishing, training, and coordinating the different operators and institutions needed for the proper implementation of the General Law at all government levels.

The situation of forced disappearance has reached a critical point in recent years where neither the government nor society as a whole can deny its impact. It is incontrovertible that the enactment of the General Law, as a legislative measure aimed to ensure and fulfil the rights of justice, truth and reparation of the victims of forced disappearance and their next of kin is an action without precedent, thanks primarily, to the lifelong fight of those whose lives have placed them in one of the worst situations a person can ever find themselves, not knowing the fate of their loved ones.
