

CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM IN MEXICO: AN OVERVIEW

David A. SHIRK*

ABSTRACT: This article examines the package of constitutional and legislative reforms approved in 2008 with the goal of improving the Mexican criminal justice system. These reforms included new criminal procedures (oral adversarial trials, alternative sentencing, and alternative dispute resolution mechanisms), stronger due process protections for the accused, police and prosecutorial reforms to strengthen public security, criminal investigations, and new measures to combat organized crime. The author explains the procedural and institutional changes involved in the reforms. He argues that, while there has been significant progress in several states, there are several challenges for judicial reform in Mexico over the short-term, medium-term, and longer term. These challenges include the need to better coordinate across branches of government to establish new regulations and statutes; the need to properly prepare a wide array of judicial sector personnel to implement the new system; the need to construct new physical infrastructure for live, video-recorded court proceedings; and the need to properly monitor and evaluate the performance of the new system.

RESUMEN. Este artículo examina la serie de reformas constitucionales y legislativas federales aprobadas en 2008 con el objetivo de mejorar el sistema de justicia penal en México. Estas reformas incluyen nuevos procedimientos penales (juicios orales, penas alternativas, así como métodos alternos de resolución de controversias), una mayor protección del debido proceso para el acusado, y reformas para fortalecer la seguridad pública y la procuración de la justicia. En la reforma también se incluyen nuevas medidas para luchar contra la delincuencia organizada. El autor explica los nuevos procedimientos y cambios institucionales incluidos en la reforma. Argumenta que si bien ha habido avances significativos en varios estados, aún hay varios desafíos para la reforma judicial en México en el corto, mediano y largo plazo. Estos desafíos incluyen la necesidad de una mejor coordinación a nivel federal; establecer nuevas normas y estatutos; preparar adecuadamente el personal del sector judicial para aplicar el nuevo sistema; construir nueva infraestructura física, y garantizar una vigilancia adecuada para evaluar el desempeño del nuevo sistema.

I. CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM IN MEXICO

As stories of crime and violence play out in the headlines, Mexico is in the midst of a major transformation of its judicial sector. In recent years, Mexico has been gradually implementing a series of reforms that advocates hope will dramatically improve public security and the administration of justice over the next decade. Central to the process of judicial reform in Mexico is a package of ambitious legislative changes and constitutional amendments passed by the Mexican Congress in 2008, and to be implemented throughout the country by 2016. Together, these reforms virtually touch upon all aspects of the judicial sector, including police, prosecutors, public defenders, the courts and the penitentiary system. The reforms include significant changes in Mexican criminal procedure, new measures to promote greater access to justice (for both criminal defendants and crime victims), new functions for law enforcement and public security agencies in the administration of justice, and tougher measures for fighting organized crime.

Advocates of the reforms hope that they will help Mexico to achieve a more democratic Rule of Law by introducing greater transparency, accountability and due process to Mexico's judicial sector. However, critics note that the reforms attempt to achieve too much in too little time, contain blatantly contradictory features and fail to address persistent problems of institutionalized corruption. Meanwhile, although there has been substantial attention to Mexico's judicial sector reforms among Mexican scholars and legal experts, there has been remarkably little effort to outline these initiatives for an international audience. As policy makers and experts contemplate renewed efforts to strengthen Mexican judicial sector institutions, there is great urgency to understand what progress has been made so far in Mexican judicial sector reform and what issues remain to be improved. This article helps to fill the gap in our current understanding of these problems by explaining Mexico's justice sector challenges, the specific changes proposed under the 2008 reform package and the challenges that lie in store for Mexico as it implements judicial sector reforms over the next decade.

II. MEXICO'S PUBLIC SECURITY CRISIS, DEMOCRATIC GOVERNANCE AND THE RULE OF LAW

While images of violence, lawlessness and official corruption are often greatly exaggerated in stereotypes and media portrayals, the Mexican criminal justice system has clearly faced critical challenges over the few last decades. A series of economic crises beginning in the mid-1970s contributed to elevated levels of violent crime —particularly robbery, property crime and assault— which continued with the economic restructuring and currency devaluations in the 1980s and 1990s.¹ These problems of “common crime” were accompanied by the corrupting effects and violent behavior of organized crime syndicates during this same period. Over the last decade, the problem of high-profile crime and violence reached new extremes, as exemplified by the more than 28,000 drug-related homicides from 2001-2010, many of which have reached new levels of brutality and malice.² In recent years especially, organized crime has had broader effects as drug trafficking organizations (DTOs) have diversified their activities to include arms smuggling, money laundering, kidnapping, bank robbery and other forms of organized criminal activity.

The weaknesses of Mexico’s criminal justice system contribute to extraordinarily high levels of criminal impunity and weak protections for the rights of the accused. This, in turn, has led to low public confidence in the judicial sector. In a 2007 Gallup poll, only 37% of Mexicans responded positively to the question, “do you have confidence in Mexico’s judicial system?,” while 58% said “no” and 4% “don’t know.”³ According to the Mitofsky polling firm, police are ranked among the least respected Mexican institutions: just one in ten Mexicans has some or much confidence in police agencies.⁴ Mexican citizens distrust law enforcement officials not only because of the perception that authorities are unable to solve crimes, but because of the perception (and reality) that there is widespread corruption and criminal activity on the part of justice system operatives, most notably the police.⁵ As a result, victimization surveys suggest 25% or fewer crimes exception to the rising tide of crime in Mexico is found in homicide rates, which have generally declined since the mid-20th century despite rising levels of violent crime. ⁴ To be sure, the only institutional actors in Mexico less well respected than police are unions, legislators and political parties. Consulta Mitofsky, Economía, gobierno y política, Mexico City (2010), www.consultamitofsky.com.mx.

Much of the problem has to do with the fact that Mexico’s new democracy is still in the process of developing a “democratic” police force and a professional, independent judiciary. Historically, Mexican law enforcement agencies were an extension of autocratic or semi-authoritarian systems of control and have long exhibited significant problems of institutional corruption. Police organizations were generally able to impose order, but were also used as instruments of patronage and political coercion.⁷ Mexico’s transformation from a virtual one-party state into a multi-party democracy has brought significant changes with regard to the expectations for the nation’s public security apparatus, making the use of traditional coercive tactics and accommodation of organized crime unacceptable. Partly as a result of their evolving role, police organizations not only lack the capacity to adequately enforce the law, but the degree of accountability that promotes greater effectiveness, professionalism, integrity and adherence to due process.⁸ In other words, police reform has not kept pace with Mexico’s democratic regime change.

Meanwhile, by many accounts, the administration of justice through Mexico’s court system has also proved woefully inadequate. As is common to other parts of Latin America, the problems faced by the Mexican judiciary are largely attributable to the historical neglect —if not outright subversion— of the institution in the political system. Due to several factors that hindered democratic development in the 19th and 20th centuries, Mexico's judiciary has been far weaker than its legislature and (especially) its executive branch.⁹ In Mexico and most Latin American countries, large majorities express a lack of confidence in judicial sector institutions.¹⁰ In Mexico, these concerns owe partly to persistent and deeply ingrained problems in the functioning of courts and penal institutions, which suffer from significant resource limitations and case backlogs. As a result, only about one in five reported crimes are fully investigated and an even smaller fraction of these result in trial and sentencing. The net result is widespread criminal impunity, with perhaps one or two out of every 100 crimes resulting in a sentence (See Figure 1).¹¹ For the victims of crimes in Mexico, there is rarely any justice.

⁶ ICESI victimization surveys suggest that no more than a quarter of all crimes (roughly 22% in 2008) are actually reported. 39% of those who do not report crimes indicate that it is a waste of time; the next largest proportion (16%) indicate that they do not trust the authorities and 10% say that the process of reporting a crime is too cumbersome. A third (33%) of those who reported a crime said that no result was obtained from reporting the crime. See www.icesi.com.mx.

¹⁰ After decades of insignificance in Latin America, courts have played an increasingly important role in addressing issues of transitional justice, in constitutional deliberations and in reforms to the administration of justice throughout the region. A central theme throughout much of the new literature on the judiciary in Latin America is the link between democracy and the Rule of Law, particularly the role of the courts in protecting a democratic society against abuses of authority in a context of political uncertainty. Yet, there are also problems of access to justice for those accused of a crime. Those few cases in which a suspect is detained and brought to trial are hampered by lengthy, inefficient criminal proceedings that often lack an adherence to due process.¹² Police investigators are often poorly trained and inadequately equipped to employ modern investigative and forensic techniques in the course of a criminal proceeding. State and federal investigative police agencies exhibit disturbing patterns of corruption and abuse, including the use of bribery and torture, according to surveys of prison inmates.¹³ Meanwhile, during the course of criminal proceedings, defendants are frequently held in “pre-trial detention,” with very limited access to bail even when the offense is relatively minor.¹⁴ During pre-trial detention and despite the “presumption of innocence,” the accused are frequently mixed with the general prison population while they await trial and sentencing.

Once a suspect has been identified, however, a guilty verdict is highly likely, particularly when a suspect is poor and the crime is petty. Indeed, although the probability of being arrested, investigated and prosecuted for a crime is extremely low, as many as 85% of crime suspects formally charged are found guilty.¹⁶ Recent studies suggest that nearly half of all prisoners in Mexico City were convicted for property crimes valued at less than 20 dollars.¹⁷ According to critics of Mexico's criminal justice system, these patterns are attributable to the lack of an adequate legal defense and the fact that there is ready acceptance of the prosecutor's pre-trial investigations as evidence at trial. Also in this context, a suspect's guilty plea is often the sole cause for indictment and conviction, and a disturbingly high proportion of torture cases in Mexico involves forced confessions.¹⁸ Meanwhile, armed with superior resources, access to evidence and procedural advantages, public prosecutors are often able to easily overpower the meager legal defense available to most accused criminals. Additionally, faced with overwhelming caseloads, the judge that rules on preliminary hearings is the same judge at trial and sentencing. This same judge frequently delegates matters—including court appearances—to courtroom clerks. As a result, many inmates report that they never even had a chance to appear before the judge who sentenced them.

Once in prison—whether for pre-trial detention or final sentencing—inmates typically encounter severely overcrowded facilities, inadequate access to basic amenities, corrupt and abusive prison guards, violence and intimidation from other inmates, and ongoing criminal behavior (including rampant drug use).¹⁹ According to official statistics, Mexican prisons are ¹⁵ Luhnow, supra note 14.

¹⁷ Héctor Tobar, Judicial Overhaul in Mexico, L. A. TIMES, Mar. 7, 2008.

overcrowded on average by more than 30% above capacity in 2009 and with continuously growing populations. Prisons in the Federal District and the State of Mexico, the two entities with the largest prison populations operated at 212% and 183% capacity, respectively.²⁰ According to a survey conducted in those same states, conditions inside prisons are very bad and getting worse: in 2009, over 70% of inmates reported that they did not have enough food, a dramatic increase from previous years. Such conditions help to explain the serious problems of rioting and escapes that have plagued Mexican prisons in recent years.²¹ More important, these conditions illustrate the inadequacy of Mexico's penal system—and perhaps the use of incarceration, in general—as a means of promoting the rehabilitation of convicted criminals.²²

In short, the overall picture is one where the “un-rule of law” prevails and there is a severe lack of access to justice, particularly for the indigent.²³ For Mexico and other Latin American countries that have undergone democratic transitions in recent decades, achieving the Rule of Law presents a major test of regime performance since perceptions of the judicial system appear to be positively correlated with support for democratic gover-oped an addiction once in prison. This implies added social costs, Azaola and Bergman argue, since addicted prisoners are more likely to become connected to other delinquents and develop full-fledged criminal careers. ELENA AZAOLA GARRIDO, LA INSTITUCIÓN CORRECCIONAL EN MÉXICO: UNA MIRADA EXTRAVIADA (Siglo Veintiuno, 1990).

nance.²⁴ In Mexico, concerns about the country's on-going public security crisis have led authorities to introduce major changes with the goal of modernizing the nation's law enforcement agencies and empowering the judiciary. Whether they are successful may have important implications for overall support for democratic governance and significantly shape the decisions of the Mexican electorate in the coming years. To better evaluate the challenges that reformers face, the contours of the country's criminal justice system and the nature of recent reform initiatives are considered in more detail below.

III. WHAT KIND OF REFORM? ORAL TRIALS, DUE PROCESS AND MORE

The legal foundations of the Mexican criminal justice system are found in the country's post-independence constitutions, as well as in both federal and state administrative laws, criminal codes and criminal procedure laws (See Table 1, next page). According to Cossio et al., the first Mexican criminal code was introduced by the State of Veracruz in 1835. During the government of Emperor Maximilian (1864-67), Mexico briefly adopted the French criminal code. Later, following the example of Spain, Mexico adopted the 1871 Federal Criminal Code (Código Penal Federal, CPF) under President Benito Juárez.²⁵ Generally speaking, these foundations placed Mexico within the civil law tradition, which typically relies on an inquisitorial model of criminal procedure where an instructional judge actively leads the investigation and process of determining a suspect's guilt or innocence. It is important to note that there is enormous variation in the application of inquisitorial criminal procedures around the world. Indeed, Mexico has developed a highly unique legal tradition that mixes elements of different systems and includes several unique features, such as a special writ of protection or injunction (juicio de amparo) introduced in the 19th century.²⁶

²⁵ JOSÉ RAMÓN COSSÍO ET AL., MEXICAN LAW (Oxford University Press, 2005).

The advent of a new revolutionary constitution in 1917 brought further adaptations to Mexico's criminal justice system and new efforts to reform the country's criminal (or penal) codes over the next decade and a half.²⁷ First, the new constitution eliminated the Ministry of Justice and, significantly, the figure of the instructional judge. As discussed below in more detail, this has given prosecutors a more central role in the investigation and prosecution of crimes, a move that has set Mexico significantly apart from other inquisitorial systems. Second, a new criminal code —outlining both the principles of Mexican criminal law and specific crimes and punishments— was finally enacted in 1931, and has remained the primary basis of Mexican criminal law throughout most of the post-revolutionary period. The formal procedures associated with the Federal Criminal Code (Código Penal Federal, CPF) are contained in the Federal Code of Criminal Procedure (Código Federal de Procedimientos Penales, CFPP) generated in 1934. The CPF and CFPP generally set the example for state-level criminal codes and procedures, though there is significant variation across different states (particularly with regard to criminal codes).

Over the last two decades, a series of reforms to the above structures have been implemented in Mexico, leading to substantial implications for the criminal justice system and democratic governance overall. Under President Miguel de la Madrid (1982-88), the 1980s brought the dismantling of the nation's federal police agency, as well as new structures for coordinating national security policy.²⁸ In December 1994, under President Ernesto Zedillo

²⁸ The Federal Security Directorate (Dirección Federal de Seguridad, DFS) oversaw domestic security matters from 1947 to 1985, and served as one of the federal government's primary instrument of social and political control. The dissolution of the DFS, due to problems of rampant corruption, led to the creation and destruction of a series of new federal law enforcement agencies over the next two decades. The DFS was replaced by the Center for Investigation and National Security (Centro de Investigación y Seguridad Nacional, CISEN). Later, another federal police agency, the Federal Judicial Police (Policía Federal Judicial, PFJ), widely regarded as corrupt, was replaced by the Federal Investigative Agency (Agencia Federal de Investigación, AFI) by presidential decree in 2001, ostensibly to develop capabilities similar to the U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation. However, in December 2005, the PGR announced that nearly one-fifth of AFI officers were under investiga-

(1994-2000), the federal government restructured the national public security system and reformed the judiciary to promote higher professional standards,²⁹ stronger powers of judicial review,³⁰ new standards for judicial precedent³¹ and greater judicial independence.³² In November 1996, the Zedillo administration also introduced the Federal Organized Crime Law (Ley Federal contra la Delincuencia Organizada, LFDO) to address the expanded power and proliferation of organized crime syndicates in recent decades.

tion for suspected involvement in organized crime. As discussed below, the agency was dissolved in 2009. Justice in Mexico Project, Justice in Mexico News Report, June 2009. <http://www.justiceinmexico.org> (last visited February 22, 2010).

³⁰ The reforms also expanded the Supreme Court's powers of judicial review by introducing "motions of unconstitutionality" (acciones de inconstitucionalidad). This innovation allowed key institutional actors—the Federal Attorney General, political parties and a designated proportion of representatives from the Senate, the Chamber of Deputies and the Mexico City and state legislatures—to challenge the constitutionality of legislation or other government actions.

Arguably, the most substantial efforts to promote judicial sector reform began during the administration of Vicente Fox (2000-2006).³³ In April 2004, the Fox administration proposed a series of constitutional and legislative changes to modernize Mexico's criminal justice system.³⁴ The 2004 proposal pressed for a comprehensive reform of including, among other major changes, a shift from Mexico's unique variation of the inquisitorial system toward a more adversarial model. Although the Fox administration was able to pass significant reforms to the juvenile justice system in 2003, the 2004 justice reform package met significant resistance and ultimately stalled in the legislature.³⁵ Despite failing to win congressional approval, the Fox administration's proposal triggered a national debate on the merits of a major judicial reform and also signaled federal approval of Mexican states working to implement similar reforms at a sub-national level.³⁶ The states of Nuevo León, Chihuahua and Oaxaca were among the earliest to adopt new adversarial procedures and other innovations.³⁷

While few concrete process indicators are available to gauge the impact of these changes, the perception that these state-level reforms have contributed to greater judicial efficiency and transparency helped build support for the Mexican Congress to adopt federal level judicial reforms in March 2008, during the current administration of PAN President Felipe Calderón (2006-2012). The reforms benefited from the widespread support of jurists, academics and human rights advocates favoring a greater emphasis on due process protections.³⁸ The reforms also gained broad political support in

The technical analysis generated by the project was then disseminated to inform debates occurring at state and local level. LUIS L. ³⁸ Soon after the reforms were passed, Mexico's National Human Rights Commission indicated the reforms were intended to "adjust the system to the principles of a democratic Rule of Law, such as guaranteeing the rights of victims and the accused and the impartial-part because of elevated levels of violence from organized crime, which took sharp upswings in 2007 and 2008.

The 2008 reforms comprise four main elements: 1) changes to criminal procedure through the introduction of new oral, adversarial procedures, alternative sentencing and alternative dispute resolution (ADR) mechanisms; 2) a greater emphasis on the rights of the accused (i.e., the presumption of innocence, due process and adequate legal defense); 3) modifications to police agencies and their role in criminal investigations; and 4) tougher measures for fighting organized crime. Each of these elements is explored in more detail below.

1. “Oral Trials”: Changes in Mexican Criminal Procedure

Arguably, the most heralded aspect of the 2008 reforms is the introduction of “oral trials” with live public proceedings to be held in open court. However, popular emphasis on the novelty of “oral” trial procedures is somewhat misleading for two reasons.³⁹ First, Mexican criminal courts have traditionally relied on the use of oral testimony, the presentation of evidence and argumentation, in at least some fashion.⁴⁰ Therefore, a more appropriate aspect of the reform to emphasize is the larger transition from Mexico’s unique inquisitorial model of criminal procedure to an adversarial model that draws elements from the United States, Germany, Chile and other countries. A second reason that the emphasis on “orality” is somewhat over-played is that, with the transition to adversarial trial proceedings, live oral trials will be used in only a small fraction of the criminal cases brought before Mexican courts. This is because the reform involves ity of trials, to develop more effective practices against organized crime and in the functioning of prisons, as well as linking the National Public Security System to the protection of human rights and obliging authorities at all three levels of government to coordinate broadly and truly share information on criminality and police personnel; to regulate the vetting, training and tenure of personnel, to certify competency and open spaces for social participation in evaluation [of the system].” COMISIÓN NACIONAL DE LOS DERECHOS HUMANOS (2008). SEGUNDO INFORME ESPECIAL DE LA COMISIÓN NACIONAL DE LOS DERECHOS HUMANOS SOBRE EL EJERCICIO EFECTIVO DEL DERECHO FUNDAMENTAL A LA SEGURIDAD PÚBLICA EN NUESTRO PAÍS (Mexico, 2008).

other changes, notably alternative sentencing (e. g., plea-bargaining or juicio abreviado) and alternative dispute resolution mechanisms (ADRs). These procedural innovations are intended to reduce the overall number of cases handled in court to thereby relieve congestion in the criminal justice system. With sentences that contemplate alternatives to prison (such as mediation, community service, reparations to victims, etc.), the reforms are intended to achieve greater efficiency and restorative justice (justicia restaurativa).

It should be pointed out that, contrary to conventional wisdom, Mexico does not have a true inquisitorial system, in which the judge plays a leading role as the “inquisitor” overseeing the investigation and prosecution of a criminal case. Rather, Mexico has its own unique adaptation on that system, which evolved on its own trajectory after independence.⁴¹ As illustrated in Figure 2, a criminal proceeding in Mexico begins when a criminal act is reported to the public prosecutor (Ministerio Público) in one of three ways: a) police must report all crimes they observe through investigation or in flagrante, b) a victim or a third party plaintiff (ofendido), may file a report (denuncia) or c) the victim may present a “private criminal charge,” or a querrela, in which the victim himself or herself stands as the accuser (querrellante) of the suspect.⁴²

The unique features of Mexican criminal procedure become evident after a crime has been reported because Mexico’s system lacks an instructional judge (juez de instrucción), who directly leads the investigation in a “typical” inquisitorial system. Instead, in Mexico, the public prosecutor plays a central role in Mexico’s accusatory process and has a relatively high degree of autonomy.⁴³ Prosecutorial independence is especially notable during the

⁴² This is not unique to Mexico, since the same methods are found in the inquisitorial systems used in Spain and in Latin American countries.

preliminary inquiry (averiguación previa), during which a suspect is investigated and formally indicted of a crime.⁴⁴

Indeed, critics contend that the power and autonomy of the public prosecutor at this stage of preliminary inquiry is one of the major contributors to the abuses found in the traditional Mexican system, including forced confessions and the mishandling of evidence.⁴⁶

Reglamentaria del Artículo 102 de la Constitución de la República), and the 1983 Organic Law of the Federal Attorney General (Ley Orgánica de la Procuraduría General de la República). Subsequent modifications to the LOMPF in 1941 and 1955 and the LOPGR in 1984, 1985, 1987, 1988, 1993 and 1996 progressively strengthened prosecutorial autonomy and restructured federal law enforcement agencies in Mexico.

⁴⁶ Zepeda, supra note 11. Cossío et al., supra note 25; CLAIRE NAVAL, IRREGULARITIES, ABUSES OF POWER, AND ILLTREATMENT IN THE FEDERAL DISTRICT: THE RELATION BETWEEN POLICE AND MINISTERIO PÚBLICO AGENTS, AND THE POPULATION (Fundar, Center for Analysis and Research, 2006).

That said, Mexican judges do work closely with the prosecutor to continue to compile evidence and testimony during the preliminary hearing for formally indicting the suspect (pre-instrucción) and the evidentiary phase (instrucción). They also have the authority to seek out evidence on their own, and frequently do so, in the manner of an instructional judge found in other systems. As in other inquisitorial systems, there is also some adversarial presentation of arguments during the last phase of the process that leads to a final judgment (juicio) since the judge receives final arguments (conclusiones) from both the prosecution and the defense. In the end, it is left to the judge to determine the guilt or innocence of the accused and decide on the appropriate sentence (sentencia) for the crime.⁴⁷ After the verdict has been delivered in the court of first jurisdiction (primera instancia), either the prosecutor or the accused may contest this decision at a court of appeals (segunda instancia).

While not necessarily attributable to its roots in the inquisitorial model per se, the Mexican criminal procedure in operation exhibits important liabilities.⁴⁸ The fact that much evidence is presented in the form of written affidavits (actas or actuaciones) often contributes to a fairly cumbersome process, particularly where there are significant bureaucratic inefficiencies. As a result, the processing of criminal cases in Mexico often takes place over an unusually lengthy period, with many suspects waiting in jail for years before they receive a sentence. Moreover, because the evidentiary phase takes place largely outside of public view, this lack of transparency contributes to widespread allegations that Mexican judges are neglectful or even corrupt.⁴⁹ Meanwhile, some legal scholars have expressed concerns about the powerful and decisive role of Mexican public prosecutors and the potential for abuse that this allows. Finally, due to the infrequent release of suspects on their own recognizance or on bail in Mexico, a person accused of a crime is typically held in “preventive prison” (prisión preventiva), even for relatively minor crimes. This often leads to the mischaracterization that a suspect is “guilty until proven innocent” in Mexico.⁵⁰

In contrast to the inquisitorial model, the adversarial model—more typically associated with common law systems like the United States or the United Kingdom— involves a different set of procedures and roles for the main protagonists. One of the primary characteristics of adversarial systems is that the judge functions as an impartial mediator between two opposing “adversaries”—the prosecution and the defense—as they present competing evidence and arguments in open court. This lends to certain perceived advantages and disadvantages of adversarial systems. Among the advantages are the checks and balances built in to the criminal proceeding, as well as both efficiency and transparency in the presentation of evidence in court. However, adversarial systems also place at least one of the adversaries in the uncomfortable position of actively advocating for the “wrong” side and sometimes winning.⁵¹

Meanwhile, in adversarial systems, the judge is often less directly involved in other phases outside of the trial, such as the preliminary hearing to indict the suspect (the equivalent of Mexico’s pre-instrucción), the determination of guilt (which is often left to a jury in a full-blown trial) and the oversight of final sentencing (which is generally administrated by parole boards). Also in adversarial systems, the final sentence in a criminal case is more commonly the result of a negotiated agreement between the prosecutor and the accused, who accepts a guilty plea in exchange for a lesser sentence (juicio abreviado). Finally, in adversarial systems, there is generally a more active role of the defense counsel in representing the defendant throughout the criminal proceedings, and in presenting evidence and arguments in court.⁵²

⁵⁰ As in the United States, Mexican criminal law presumes the innocence of the suspect, even if they are unable to make bail. In practice, though, the proportion of defendants who are released on bail or on their own recognizance in Mexico is very small, given the strong emphasis on establishing probable cause prior to indictment and the large proportion of indigent defendants (who may be considered a flight risk). Thus, the issue of “guilty until proven innocent” has more to do with the relatively inflexible criteria for pre-trial release in Mexico. Cossío et al., supra note 25, at 358.

⁵² While inquisitorial systems also have defense counsel for the accused, their interaction with judges and prosecutors tends to focus primarily on assuring adherence to proper criminal procedure.

Under the 2008 reforms, the Mexican federal government, and eventually all state governments, will adopt many aspects of the adversarial model over the coming years. This shift implies many significant changes to the roles of key players and the legal structures that regulate the criminal justice system (See Figure 4). The implications for criminal legal procedure include a more abbreviated and less formalized preliminary investigative phase, and greater reliance on the presentation of testimony and evidence during live, public trials that are recorded for subsequent review or appeal.⁵³ The reforms also include several additional innovations intended to promote a more efficient division of labor, relieve congestion and case backlogs, and provide greater checks and balances throughout the process. As noted above, these changes will have significant implications for each of the major players in Mexican law enforcement and administration of justice: the defendant, police, judges, prosecutors, defense attorneys and the victim.

First, in keeping with the design of the adversarial model, Mexican judges will now play more of a moderating role during the trial phase, while prosecutors and defense counselors present arguments and evidence in live, recorded oral hearings. An equally important innovation is that the reforms also create special judgeships for different phases of the criminal proceedings, ostensibly promoting an efficient division of labor and fewer conflicts of interest. A due process judge, or juez de garantías, will preside over the pre-trial phase (investigation, preliminary hearing, indictment and plea-bargaining). As discussed in greater detail below, the creation of the new due process judge is primarily intended to ensure due process prior to the trial phase. A sentencing judge, or juez de sentencia (also called the juez de juicio oral), will preside over the trial phase, the presentation of oral arguments and the final verdict. A sentencing implementation judge (juez de ejecución de sentencia) ensures that sentences are properly applied and monitors processes of restorative justice (e. g., redress of damages).⁵⁴

Meanwhile, the public prosecutor (Ministerio Público) will lose some of the power traditionally vested in that office. With the introduction of probable cause as a basis for criminal indictment, the preliminary investigation (averiguación previa) is no longer as central to the process. This means that the role of the public prosecutor is less decisive in determining the probable guilt of the accused (probable responsabilidad), but also that the public prosecutor requires less immediate evidence to initiate a charge or arrest than under the old system (due to modifications to Article 19, Paragraph 1). The public prosecutor will still have substantial discretion about whether or not to seek prosecution under a provision known as “the principle of opportunity” (principio de oportunidad), which allows the prosecutor to strategically weigh his or her decision against the resource limitations and priorities facing law enforcement.

One possible concern, however, is that prosecutors could avoid taking a case for political, personal or other reasons. Hence under Article 20, Section C of the Mexican Constitution, the reforms also allow crime victims to file a criminal motion before a judge in certain cases, which will exert pressure on public prosecutors to investigate cases. The reforms also include privacy protections to conceal the identity of the victim, plaintiff and witnesses, and a system for the redress of grievances (reparación del daño) through mediation or other solutions.

2. The Rights of the Accused: Guarantees for the Presumption of Innocence, Due Process and an Adequate Legal Defense

Also included in the 2008 reforms are stronger constitutional protections for the presumption of innocence, a more substantial role for judges during distinct phases of the criminal proceeding (including requirements for the physical presence of a judge during all hearings involving the defendant), specific provisions banning the use of torture, new measures to provide a quality legal defense for the accused and other procedural safeguards intended to bolster due process. This new emphasis on the protections for the rights of the accused is frequently described as creating a “system of guarantees” or a sistema garantista.⁵⁵

First, as part of the presumption of innocence, the 2008 reforms seek to limit the use of preventative detention or “pre-trial” detention. In recent years, because of case backlogs and inefficiencies, more than 40% of Mexico’s prison population (some 90,000 prisoners) has consisted of prisoners waiting in jail for a final verdict.⁵⁶ Many suspects are detained even when charged with relatively minor offenses, such as shoplifting or an automobile accident.⁵⁷ Moreover, pre-trial detainees are frequently mixed with the general prison population and in many instances their cases are not adjudicated for exceedingly long periods of time. Under the new reforms, pre-trial detention is only to be applied in cases of violent or serious crimes and for suspects who are considered a flight risk or a danger to society. Also, the new reforms require those held in pre-trial detention to be housed in separate prison facilities (away from convicted criminals) and only for a maximum of two years without a sentence.

⁵⁵ “Garantismo” is a loaded term in Mexico. On the one hand, it is used in a positive sense by progressive jurists concerned about the real effect of civil rights. On the other hand, it is used disparagingly by more conservative jurists who think judges and the state should be more concerned about the form and procedures of the law than with protecting particular interests. This tension resonates with discussions about legal or judicial “activism” in the United States.

⁵⁶ Juan Ciudadano, La propuesta Carbonell, EL NORTE, Nov. 27, 2006; Necesaria la reforma judicial: Azuela, EL PORVENIR, Nov. 27, 2006; Urge a reformar sistema de justicia, REFORMA, Nov. 17, 2006; Claudia Salazar, Proponen limitar prisión preventiva, REFORMA, Nov. 26, 2006.

Second, as noted earlier, the 2008 reforms created a new due process judge, the juez de garantías or juez de control, whose role is to ensure that a criminal case moves forward properly during its investigation, preliminary hearing and indictment. The due process judge is responsible for determining whether a suspect's rights should be limited during the trial phase (e.g., pre-trial detention, house arrest, restraining order) or whether the suspect should be released on bail or on his or her own recognizance until a guilty verdict has been delivered. The due process judge will also issue the final sentence in cases in which the defendant accepts a plea bargain (juicio abreviado), in which all parties accept that the accused will receive a lesser sentence in exchange for a guilty plea. The due process judge will also oversee other alternative dispute resolution processes, such as the use of mediation.

The creation of the new judicial roles will have a number major implications. It implies a greater role for judges during the pre- and post-trial phases. During the pre-trial phase, the due process judge will strive to protect the rights and interests of all parties—including the accused, the victim, and witnesses—as the case moves forward toward a public oral trial.⁵⁸ During the post-trial phase, the sentencing implementation judge will effectively play the role of U.S. parole board, monitoring the proper application of a sentence and any violations of mediation agreements.⁵⁹ As noted above, the creation of the due process judge implies a certain degree of separation of powers in the judiciary: the judge who determines whether a suspect is indictable will not be the same individual who must make a final determination of guilt. Theoretically, this will allow both judges to specialize to a greater degree, thereby ostensibly allowing greater efficiency in the processing of criminal cases.⁶⁰ Finally, the separation of powers will theoretically reduce conflicts of interest and provide checks and balances, since the oral trial judge will make a final decision without having made prior conclusions about the defendant's "probable guilt."⁶¹

⁵⁸ As such, the due process judge must: “strike a balance between two legitimate, but conflicting interests: on the one hand, the guarantee of due process for the person under investigation and, secondly, the effective application of criminal law. While seeking to protect a person investigated for a crime from any violation of their rights in the process of arrest, searches, seizures and interception of communications, [the juez de control] also attempts to safeguard the proper unfolding of important investigatory proceedings.” Sergio Valls Hernández, El juez de control en México, MILENIO, Dec. 9, 2008.

Another important change included in the new reforms is the emphasis on the judge's physical presence at all the hearings involving the defendant. Under Mexico's traditional system, criminal proceedings do not primarily take place at live audiences within a condensed timeframe and hearings are sometimes conducted by court clerks without the presence of the actual judge. The result is that many criminal defendants attest that they never had direct interaction with the judge who handled their case. Indeed, in surveys with Mexican inmates, Azaola and Bergman report that 80% of inmates interviewed in the Federal District and the State of Mexico were not able to speak to the judge who tried their case.⁶² With the shift to an emphasis on the physical presence of the judge throughout the criminal proceeding, crime suspects and their legal defense counsel will presumably have a greater ability to make direct appeals to the individual who will decide their case.

Third, the reforms also include specific provisions under Article 20 of the Mexican Constitution that admonish the use of torture. In response to the aforementioned problems of torture-based confessions in the Mexican criminal justice system, the reforms make it unlawful to present a suspect's confession as evidence in court (unless obtained in the presence of the suspect's defense attorney). In theory, this means that the prosecutor will have to rely on other evidence to obtain a conviction, and thereby conduct more thorough investigations. This also means that the accused will theoretically have the benefit of good legal counsel and a more informed understanding of the consequences prior to implicating themselves in a crime.

Finally, with regard to the rights of the accused, the reforms aim to strengthen and raise the bar for a suspect's defense counsel. All criminal defendants will be required to have professional legal representation. Under the reforms, any third party serving as the defense counsel for the accused must be a lawyer, a change from the prior system, which allowed any trusted person (persona de confianza) to represent the accused. Under constitutional amendments to Article 17, the reform requires that there be a strong system of public defenders to protect the rights of the poor and indigent. This provision is extremely important, given that the vast majority of defendants rely on a public defender (defensor de oficio). Indeed, the same prisoner survey noted above found that 75% of inmates were represented by a public defender, and 60% of these changed attorneys because of the indifference they perceived in their first public defender.⁶³

⁶¹ Under the old system, a judge who determined there was probable cause to try a suspect in the pre-trial phase might, theoretically, be disinclined to reverse his prior decision on the merits of the case during the trial phase. This conflict of interest is presumably eliminated by the separation of judicial decisions in the pre-trial and trial phases.

⁶² Azaola & Bergman, supra note 19.

3. Police Reform: Merging Preventive and Investigative Capacity

The main criticisms of the Mexican criminal justice system reside less with judges and courtroom procedure than with law enforcement, particularly prosecutors (ministerios públicos) and police officers.⁶⁴ While most attention to the 2008 judicial reforms has focused on the shift in courtroom procedures, equally important changes are in store for police investigations and law enforcement agencies. Specifically, the reforms aim toward a greater integration of police into the administration of justice. Under Mexico's traditional system, most police were ostensibly dedicated to preventive functions, and —aside from detaining individuals in flagrante delicto— not considered central to the work of prosecutors and judges. Under the new system, police will need to develop their capacity and skills to protect and gather evidence to help prosecutors, judges and even defense attorneys determine the facts of a case and ensure that justice is done. As police become more critical to criminal investigations and proceedings, it is essential and urgent that they be adequately prepared to carry out these responsibilities properly. Under Mexico's 2008 reforms, the Constitution (Article 21, Paragraphs 1-10) underscores the need to modernize Mexican police forces, which are now expected to demonstrate greater professionalism, objectivity and respect for human rights. While the reforms provide an eight-year period for the transition to the new adversarial system, many of the reforms affecting police have already entered into effect.

The most significant change is that the reforms strengthen the formal investigative capacity of police to gather evidence and investigate criminal activity, in collaboration with the public prosecutor, or Ministerio Público. For example, under reforms to Article 21, Paragraph 1 of the Mexican Constitution, along with public prosecutors and investigators, police will now share responsibility for securing the crime scene and gathering evidence. This is significant because, until recently, as many as 75% of Mexico's more than 400,000 police lacked investigative capacity, were deployed primarily for patrol and crime prevention, and were largely absolved of any responsibilities to secure or gather evidence. Given that evidence collected by the reporting officer is often a primary tool for the prosecution in other criminal justice systems, the limited capacity of Mexican police in this regard seriously limits and sometimes even interferes with the successful resolution of criminal cases.

The 2008 reforms now open the door to greater police cooperation with criminal investigators, and even the reorganization of police agencies to facilitate more effective police investigations. At the federal level, thanks to supporting legislation passed in May 2009, the Attorney General's Office (Procuraduría General de la República, PGR) and the Ministry of Public Security (Secretaría de Seguridad Pública, SSP) have already reorganized their respective police agencies. Under the Organic Law of the Federal Attorney General (Ley Orgánica de la Procuraduría General de la República), the PGR effectively dissolved the Federal Agency of Investigations (Agencia Federal de Investigaciones, AFI) and created the new Federal Ministerial Police (Policía Federal Ministerial, PFM). Agents of the Attorney General's police forces will now have greater powers to investigate crimes but will also be subjected to more rigorous "trust" tests (control de confianza). For example, included under the new legislation are provisions that expand the ability of the Assistant Attorney General for Special Investigation of Organized Crime (subprocurador de Investigación Especializada de Delincuencia Organizada, SIEDO) to assume responsibility for crimes that are normally reserved for local jurisdiction (fuero común). This procedure, known as "attraction" (atracción), will enable—and presumably compel—the federal government to assume a greater role in investigating severe crimes that are beyond the capacity of state and local law enforcement.

Even more significant, the 2008 reforms allow for combining crime prevention and investigative functions that were formerly performed by separate law enforcement agencies: the preventive police and the investigative police. Under supporting legislation for these reforms, the 2009 Federal Police Law (Ley de la Policía Federal), the SSP replaced its Federal Preventive Police (Policía Federal Preventiva, PFP), creating the new Federal Police (Policía Federal).⁶⁵ The new law effectively bestows investigative powers upon what was previously the Federal Preventive Police (PFP), which formerly carried out a strictly preventive function. Under the new law, Federal Police officers will be able to collaborate with the PGR on its investigations, though it is not yet clear what protocols will be ultimately developed to manage this coordination. Other new functions include securing crime scenes, executing arrest orders and processing evidence, all formerly functions of the AFI.⁶⁶ Federal Police agents also now have authorization to operate undercover to infiltrate criminal organizations.

It is somewhat unclear what implications the 2008 reforms will have for the investigation of crimes of local jurisdiction (fuero común) at the sub-national level. However, the reforms presumably open the door for the participation of state and municipal preventive police forces in criminal investigations. Moreover, in light of the 2008 reforms, proposals have already been made at both the federal and state level to fuse state and local law enforcement, effectively dismantling all municipal police forces. Under Article 115, Section VII, governors have long had the power to take command of local police forces to address severe public security problems affecting their states.⁶⁷ The 2008 reforms further specify that the State Law of Public Security will regulate municipal police forces, and federal and state authorities have been increasingly advocating the elimination of local police forces as a solution to Mexico's public security concerns.⁶⁸ It remains to be seen, Police. The agency came under fire in 2005 under widespread allegations of corruption, and in December of that year the PGR announced that nearly one-fifth of its officers were under investigation for suspected involvement in organized crime. AFI agents took to the streets in April 2009 to demand that the PGR and Congress not allow the agency to disappear. Nonetheless, Congress approved the PGR-backed measure to close the agency and President Calderón signed it into law on May 29, 2009. From the date the new law went into effect, the PGR had thirty days to purge its rosters of undesirable personnel. Former AFI agents able to pass toxicology, medical, psychological and background checks were given priority in the new agency. AFI, entre la corrupción y la eficacia, EL ECONOMISTA, Dec. 6, 2005. Gustavo Castillo & Alfredo Méndez, Con la reestructuración de la PGR inicia la reforma del sistema de seguridad, LA JORNADA, Dec. 26, 2006; Desaparece la AFI, EL FINANCIERO, May 29, 2009.

⁶⁷ There is already some variation in terms of how states already exert control over local police forces: some state capitals are protected by state police forces in lieu of locals (e. g., Morelia), some state governors formally appoint the local police chiefs (e. g., Sonora), and the state of Durango has already initiated efforts to fuse all municipal and state police agencies. Luis Cárdenas, Útil y factible la unificación de todas las policías: Andriano Morales, EL SOL DE DURANGO, Nov. 10, 2009; José María Cárdenas, En marcha la unificación de corporaciones, EL SIGLO DE DURANGO, Feb. 22, 2010.

however, whether the federal government will require all states to unify their police forces.

A separate aspect of the 2008 reforms that is intended to promote police professionalism has mixed implications. Under the reforms, police are now subject to special labor provisions that give administrators greater discretion to dismiss law enforcement personnel. Specifically, Article 123 allows authorities to dismiss police more easily, weakening their labor rights protections. While the amendment of Article 123 is intended to ensure that administrators can remove ineffective or corrupt officers, Zepeda notes that it could have the unintended effect of further undermining civil service protections that help to ensure an officer's professional development and protect him from undue pressure or persecution.⁶⁹ Police already face unpredictable career advancement and deplorable working conditions, as illustrated by the results of a recent Justice in Mexico Project survey of police in Guadalajara, Mexico's second largest city.⁷⁰ That survey found that nearly 70% of officers feel that promotions are not based on merit, and most (60%) think that personal connections drive one's career advancement on the force. If that is indeed the case, the new reforms will likely make police officers even more dependent on the whims of their superiors.

Finally, the mandate to promote police professionalism has been supported by recent efforts of the Mexican federal government to increase investments in training, equipment, infrastructure, standardization and integrity (control de confianza) for law enforcement. The two major sources of government grants to aid states and municipalities in strengthening law enforcement are the Municipal Public Security Subsidy (Subsidio para la Seguridad Pública Municipal, SUBSEMUN) and the Public Security Assistance Fund (Fondo de Aportaciones para la Seguridad Pública, FASP).⁷¹ Both funds have channeled millions of dollars in direct financial assistance to improve local and state level police agencies, respectively. However, the effectiveness of these

⁷⁰ More than 80% of the more than 5,400 participants in the study reported earning less than $800 USD per month, relatively low compared to other public sector employment. Moreover, despite civil service protections in the law, over two thirds felt that the procedures used by police departments for raises and promotions were unfair and not based on merit. Many officers reported excessively long working hours (70% work more than 50 hours a week with no overtime pay); a fifth of the force reported extremely extended shifts (a 24-hour shift for every two days off); and 68% reported 30 minutes or less for meals and breaks. funding mechanisms has been questioned, given that large amounts of money have gone unspent in recent years.⁷²

In the end, successful police reform will ultimately hinge not only on directing more resources to law enforcement agencies, but on the introduction of new checks and balances for police and prosecutors. In this regard, the shift to adversarial procedures will have a significant impact on law enforcement professionalism because, by placing greater emphasis on due process and the rights of the accused, it will necessarily raise the standards for police performance and conduct.

4. Organized Crime: Providing New Tools to Fight Crime Syndicates

Finally, the 2008 reforms also significantly target organized crime, defined in accordance with the United Nations Convention Against Organized Crime, signed in Palermo, Italy in 2000. That convention broadly defines an organized crime syndicate as “a structured group of three or more persons, existing for a period of time and acting in concert with the aim of committing one or more serious crimes or offences [with a sentence of four or more years in prison]... in order to obtain, directly or indirectly, a financial or other material benefit.”

In cases involving organized crime, the Mexican Constitution has now been amended to allow sequestering suspects under “arraigo” (literally, to “root” someone, i.e., to hold firmly) for up to 40 days without criminal charges (with the possibility of extending it an additional 40 days, up to a total of 80 days).⁷³ Under arraigo, prisoners may be held in solitary confinement and placed under arrest in special detention centers created explicitly for this purpose. Furthermore, in order to facilitate extradition, the reforms also allow for the suspension of judicial proceedings in criminal cases. Prosecutors may use the 40 day period to question the suspect and obtain evi-

⁷³ Currently, the Federal Code of Criminal Procedure does not have clear criteria on how a judge should determine the application of arraigo, or the necessary burden of proof prosecutors must bear out (e. g., probable cause). As stated under Article 133 of the CFPP, “The judicial authority may, at the request of the public prosecutor, impose preventive measures on the person against whom a criminal action is being introduced, in so far as these measures are necessary to prevent flight from judicial action; the destruction, alteration, or hiding of evidence; intimidation, threats, or improper influence over witnesses to the crime.” Janice Deaton, Arraigo and the Fight Against Organized Crime in Mexico. dence to build a case for prosecution. Because formal charges have not been levied, they are not entitled to legal representation and they are not eligible to receive credit for time served if convicted.

The arraigo procedure was first introduced in Mexico in 1983, as a measure designed to fight organized crime. However, in 2006, the Supreme Court ruled that the procedure was unconstitutional, citing violations of the habeas corpus rights of individuals held without having been charged with a criminal offense. The 2008 reforms raised the arraigo procedure to the level of a constitutional provision, thereby eliminating charges of unconstitutionality. Because arraigo applies to serious crimes, and especially organized crime, it is used primarily by federal prosecutors. However, some states—like Nuevo León—have their own provisions for the use of arraigo within their jurisdictions.⁷⁴ Critics highlight the inherent tension of accepting such an exceptional custody regime within a democratic society, and the potential abuses that it may bring. Meanwhile, how broadly, frequently, and effectively the procedure has been used since 2008 is not clear, in large part because access to information on arraigo cases is difficult to obtain.

In addition to special mechanisms for detaining organized crime suspects, the 2008 reforms also paved the way for new uses of wiretapping and other tools for fighting organized crime. Following from the 2008 reforms, new supporting legislation on asset forfeiture (extinción de dominio) was passed in 2009 to define the terms for seizing property in cases related to drug trafficking, human trafficking and auto theft.⁷⁵ Under the new law, the Federal Attorney General's office has discretion to determine when a particular suspect is involved in organized crime and whether assets related to those crimes are eligible for forfeiture.⁷⁶

More recently, in February 2010, President Felipe Calderón proposed a new General Law to Prevent and Sanction Crimes of Kidnappings, also known as the “Anti-Kidnapping Law” (Ley Anti-Secuestro).⁷⁷ In addition to the use of wiretapping, the bill also proposes the use of undercover operations to infiltrate kidnapping organizations, anonymous informants, witness protection programs, and asset forfeiture. If passed, the law would also apply higher penalties (30 years to life in prison) when the perpetrator poses as a government official, or kidnaps especially vulnerable individuals (minors, pregnant women, elderly persons or mentally disabled persons); the minimum sentence for a kidnapping resulting in the victim's death would be 40 years in prison.⁷⁸ The reform also proposes special prison facilities for kidnappers to serve their sentences, as well as requiring that electronic tracking devices be placed on kidnappers released from prison after serving their sentence.

IV. IMPLEMENTING JUDICIAL REFORM IN MEXICO

As noted above, a similar reform package was proposed in April 2004 by the Fox administration, but failed to gain legislative support. The 2008 judicial reform package came primarily from a bill passed in the Chamber of Deputies, with some significant modifications introduced in the Senate in December 2007.⁷⁹ The bill was approved with broad, multi-party support in the Chamber of Deputies by 462 out of 468 legislators present, and by a vote of 71-25 in the Senate on March 6, 2008.⁸⁰ Because the reform package included constitutional amendments—including revisions to ten articles (16-22, 73, 115 and 123)—final passage of the reforms required approval by a majority of the country's 32 state legislatures. The reforms came into effect with the publication of the federal government's official publication, the Diario Oficial, on June 18, 2008.

The scope and scale of change contemplated under the 2008 judicial reforms is enormous. Existing legal codes and procedures need to be radically revised at the federal and state level; courtrooms need to be remodeled and outfitted with video-recording equipment; judges, court staffs and lawyers need to be retrained; police need to be professionalized and prepared to assist with criminal investigations; and citizens need to be prepared to understand the purpose and implications of the new procedures. After the reforms passed in 2008, the federal and state governments were given until 2016—a period of eight years—to adopt the reforms.

⁷⁸ The reform contemplates even harsher penalties for public officials involved in kidnapping.

⁷⁹ One of the earliest Calderón-era legislative proposals to modify the judicial system came from Federal Deputy Jesús de León Tello, from the National Action Party (PAN). However, the bill that became the basis for the 2008 reforms was championed by the head of the Judicial Committee in the Chamber of Deputies, former-Mexico governor and then-Federal Deputy César Camacho Quiroz, from the PRI. After the bill passed in the Chamber of Deputies key provisions (dealing with the use of search and seizure without a warrant) were removed by the Senate in December 2007.

The Ministry of the Interior (Secretaría de Gobernación, SEGOB) chairs the 11-member Coordinating Council for the Implementation of the Criminal Justice System (Consejo de Coordinación para la Implementación del Sistema de Justicia Penal, CCISJP), which is aided by a technical secretary who oversees the reform process within SEGOB.⁸¹ The council also has nominal representation from academia and civil society.⁸² Although the reforms were passed in mid-2008, the CCISJP was not formally inaugurated until it first convened in June 2009, which was followed by additional meetings in August 2009 and January 2010.⁸³ This initial delay was partly attributable to the death of the former technical coordinator of the council, José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos, in a plane crash in Mexico City in April 2008, alongside then-Secretary of the Interior Juan Camilo Mouriño. The new technical coordinator for the council, Felipe Borrego Estrada, was appointed in December 2008.⁸⁴

The role of the CCISJP is to: 1) serve as a liaison between the various members of the council and other entities working to promote judicial reform, 2) monitor progress made in implementing federal reforms at the state level, 3) provide technical assistance to states working to implement the reforms (e. g., courtroom design, software, etc.), 4) assist in training judicial system operatives (e. g., judges, lawyers, legal experts) and 5) manage the administrative and financial aspects of the reform (e. g., guiding legislative budget requests). However, the CCISJP faces some significant challenges. As technical secretary (SETEC) for the CCISJP, Assistant Secretary Borrego has substantial visibility, but limited authority; an enormous mandate, but insufficient resources; and a current administration that ends in 2012, an implementation deadline that ends in 2016. Also important is the challenge of funds, since the commitment of government resources at federal and state levels will likely need to be greatly increased from their present levels to provide adequate infrastructure and training.⁸⁵

With these challenges in mind, the goal of the CCISJP is to have reforms approved in all Mexican states and implemented in 19 of 32 federal entities (31 states and the Federal District) by 2012 when the current administration leaves office.⁸⁶ In late-2010, the CCISJP made some important progress toward these goals, including establishment of interagency processes and internal regulations for CCISJP; efforts to promote public education and awareness about the reforms, including media promotion and new official publication; proposed legislation developed by the Secretary of Public Security to unify state and local police commands, tabled to the Fall 2010 legislative session; proposed legislation developed by the Secretary of the Interior for a new Federal Code of Criminal Procedure (CFPP) introduced in the Fall 2010 legislative session.⁸⁷ The new proposed CFPP drew elements from the model code that was developed by state courts in 2008, and therefore benefits from past experience and political support in the states.⁸⁸ helped oversee a dramatic increase in cross-border extraditions, including that of Gulf cartel leader Osiel Cárdenas. His replacement, Borrego Estrada, was a member of the National Action Party (PAN), served as president of the Supreme Court of Zacatecas from 1998 to 2004, and at the time of his appointment was secretary of the Justice Committee in the Chamber of Deputies and PAN representative for the Committee for the Reform of the State. ⁸⁵ One indicator of the low prioritization of resources for justice reform implementation is that the 2009 federal budget failed to include any funding for the CCISJP itself, which then required a special allocation to cover the activities of the technical secretary's office.

Meanwhile, at the state level, there has been some significant progress. Indeed, six states —Chihuahua, State of Mexico, Morelos, Oaxaca, Nuevo León and Zacatecas— had already adopted and implemented similar reforms prior to 2008, providing important precedents that influenced the federal initiative. Indeed, the states of Nuevo León and Chihuahua had already held their first oral criminal trials.⁸⁹ Meanwhile, several other states —Baja California, Durango and Hidalgo— had approved but not yet implemented state-level initiatives prior to the federal reforms. According to a January 2010 report from the CCISJP, several other states are currently working to revise their constitutions and criminal codes to achieve compliance with the 2008 reform.⁹⁰ Still, some states are lagging well behind, with no significant signs of activity aimed at adopting the reforms.⁹¹ To be sure, with a total of 18 state-level elections in 2009 and 2010, there have been significant political distractions that make it difficult to mobilize reform initiatives. However, some states will need to either accelerate the pace or eventually lobby for an extension of the current 2016 deadline to implement the reforms.

Thus, coordination among federal government branches and agencies has accelerated significantly since mid-2009, and federal efforts to reach out to states have also increased with the goal of advancing the implementation of the reforms. Among the most important elements of federal assistance at the state level are the distribution of 266 million pesos in federal subsidies in 2010 for projects to promote the implementation of state level judicial reforms (total of 19 recipient states); the development of a national training program on new oral, adversarial criminal justice system coordinated by the Comisión Nacional de Tribunales Superiores de Justicia (CONATRIJ); the development of new federally coordinated training and materials for prosecutors, public defenders and judges, and efforts to support changes to curricula in criminal law in higher educational programs; and a preliminary performance evaluation and cost assessment of state level judicial reform in the state of Chihuahua.

There are certainly real prospects for the 2008 reforms to be successful. Proponents of Mexico's judicial sector reforms point to seemingly successful transitions from inquisitorial to accusatory systems elsewhere in Latin America, most notably Chile.⁹² Indeed, the Mexican government has established an international agreement with the government of Chile to share experiences and training in order to facilitate Mexico's transition to the adversarial model of criminal procedure. The experience of Chile appears to suggest that the use of adversarial trial proceedings and alternative sentencing measures reduces paperwork, increases efficiency and helps eliminate case backlogs by concentrating procedures in a way that facilitates judicial decisions. Meanwhile, the emphasis on rights—for both the victim and the accused—is believed to strengthen the Rule of Law, promoting not only “law and order” but also government accountability and equal access to justice.

Still, despite these much-touted benefits, Mexico's judicial reforms have faced serious and merited criticism, from both traditionalists and advocates of more substantial reform. Some initially bristled at the perception that the reforms were being actively promoted by outside forces, particularly from the United States.⁹³ On a related note, given troubling gaps and inconsistencies riddled in the reforms themselves, some critics expressed concerns that the reform constituted an ill-conceived, costly and potentially dangerous attempt to impose a new model without considering the intricacies, nuances and benefits of Mexico's existing system.

Even now, despite widespread agreement that massive investments in the judicial sector will be needed, there is no concrete estimate of the reforms' anticipated financial costs on which to base budgetary allocations. However, some estimates suggest that the initial investment needed to implement reform in Mexico's two most successful states exceed $750 million pesos (roughly $70 million USD) each. Had similar investments been made in the pre-existing system, it is likely that some significant improvements would have resulted. Finally, given the proliferation of violent crime, many Mexicans are understandably reluctant to place greater emphasis on the presumption of innocence and pre-trial release, as this rights-focused approach may excessively favor criminals to the detriment of the rest of society. Counter-reform currents in Mexico express the view that “oral trials only protect the criminals.”⁹⁴ In short, traditionalist critics tend to fear that Mexico's sweeping judicial reforms may be trying to do too much, too fast, with too few resources, with too little preparation, with little probability of success, and without a real need for such a massive reorganization of the existing system.⁹⁵

Meanwhile, others worry that the reforms have not gone far enough. In the eyes of some critics, the reforms ultimately fail to address the major institutional weaknesses of the judicial sector.⁹⁶ In other countries where similar reforms have been implemented, such as Honduras, problems of corruption and inadequate professional capacity have continued to undermine the effective administration of justice. At the same time, as noted above, the 2008 reforms introduced new measures that may actually undermine fundamental rights and due process of law. The use of arraigo—sequestering of suspects without having been charged with a crime—is widely criticized for undermining habeas corpus rights and creating an “exceptional legal regime” for individuals accused of organized crime.⁹⁷ Although not usable as evidence in trial, confessions extracted (without legal representation) under arraigo can still be submitted as supporting evidence for an indictment.⁹⁸ Also of concern to due process advocates is the introduction of the use of the plea bargain (juicio abreviado), since unscrupulous prosecutors could try to use plea agreements as a means to pressure innocent persons into incriminating themselves.

Having strong rights for the accused helps ensure that the government is itself bound by the law and that all citizens have access to justice. Respecting the presumption of innocence and the due process of law ultimately imposes the burden of proof on police and prosecutors, who must demonstrate the credibility of their charges against a suspect. However, in Chile and elsewhere, concerns about pretrial release and the risk of flight by the accused has led to backsliding on reforms that provided important protections for the presumption of innocence.⁹⁹ Given the proliferation of

⁹⁸ One concern about the arraigo is that it undermines the torture prohibitions included in the reforms. According to Deaton, “The detaining authorities have a powerful incentive to torture a detainee in order to get them to make false confessions so that they may then have the “evidence” to file charges against them. Not only do they have the incentive, but given the secret nature of arraigo and its placement of detainees incommunicado, without adequate access to their attorney, arraigo is an invitation to torture. That is, it is an invitation to commit the very abuse that the constitutional prohibition against torture is designed to prevent.” Deaton, supra note 73, at 16; Liliana Alcántara, Naciones Unidas urge a desaparecer la figura del arraigo, EL UNIVERSAL, Dec. 01, 2006.

⁹⁹ Indeed, there are some concerns that reform efforts in Chile have not shown as violent crime, many Mexicans are understandably reluctant to place greater emphasis on the presumption of innocence and pre-trial release, as this rights-focused approach may excessively favor criminals to the detriment of the rest of society. To be sure, protecting the legal rights of crime suspects is often unsavory to the public, and some people have come to the cynical conclusion that “oral trials only protect the criminals.”¹⁰⁰ As a result, there is some concern among reform advocates that Mexican authorities may give in to practical and public pressures that will undermine the rights-based aspects of the reforms. In short, the road ahead for Mexico’s 2008 judicial reforms will likely be long, difficult and of uncertain destination.

V. CONCLUDING OBSERVATIONS: PROSPECTS FOR THE FUTURE

Mexico’s recent justice sector reforms are much more complex than the mere introduction of “oral trials.” They involve sweeping changes to Mexican criminal procedure, greater due process protections, new roles for judicial system operators and tougher measures against organized crime. Advocates hope that the reforms will bring greater transparency, accountability and efficiency to Mexico’s ailing justice system. However, by no means do recent reforms guarantee that Mexico will overcome its current challenges and develop a better criminal justice system. Whether this effort to reform the criminal justice system will succeed may depend less on these procedural changes than on efforts to address other long-standing problems by shoring up traditionally weak and corrupt institutions.

The ultimate legacy of these reforms will depend largely on how they are implemented and by whom. There will need to be enormous investments in the training and professional oversight of the estimated 40,000 practicing lawyers in Mexico, many of whom will operate within the criminal justice system’s new legal framework.¹⁰¹ Enabling Mexico’s legal profession to meet much progress as advocates would like. Chile has even experienced a significant counter-reform movement that has reversed some key aspects of these reforms. Verónica Venegas & Luis Vial, Boomerang: Seeking to Reform Pretrial Detention Practices in Chile, JUSTICE INITIATIVES (2008).

¹⁰¹ Since there are no requirements that lawyers maintain active bar membership or registration to practice law, the total number of practicing lawyers is unknown. Fix-Fierro estimates this number to be around 40,000, but there is no clear indication exactly how many of these practice criminal law. Fix-Fierro suggests that, given the proliferation of Mexican law schools in recent years, Mexico’s legal profession suffers from a problem of quantity-over-quality. La administración de la justicia en México, REVISTA AMEINAPE (Héctor Fix-Fierro & Juan Ricardo Jiménez Gómez eds., 1997).

these higher standards will require a significant revision of educational requirements, greater emphasis on vetting and continuing education to practice law, better mechanisms to sanction dishonest and unscrupulous lawyers, and much stronger and more active professional bar associations.¹⁰² At the same time, more than 400,000 federal, state and local law enforcement officers have been given a much larger role in promoting the administration of justice. If they are to develop into a professional, democratic and community-oriented police force, they will need to be properly vetted, held to higher standards of accountability, given the training and equipment they need to do their jobs, and treated like the professionals they are expected to be.

For comparative perspective, it is worth noting that in the United States several key reforms to professionalize the administration of justice and promote a rights-based criminal justice system only took effect in the post-war era. Around the same time, professional standards and oversight mechanisms for actors in the U.S. judicial system were developed sporadically and over the course of several decades. In the 1960s and 1970s, the United States established key provisions to ensure access to a publicly funded legal defense (1963 Gideon v. Wainwright), due process for criminal defendants (1967 Miranda v. Arizona) and other standards and practices to promote “professional” policing. In effect, this due process revolution—as well as other changes in the profession—helped raise the bar for police, prosecutors and public defenders, and thereby promoted the overall improvement of the U.S. criminal justice system.¹⁰³

Moreover, it took at least a generation and major, targeted investments to truly professionalize the U.S. law enforcement and judicial sectors. The Safe Streets Act of 1968 mandated the creation of the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration (LEAA), which helped fund criminal justice education programs. LEAA also supported judicial sector research through the National Institute of Law Enforcement and Criminal Justice, the precursor to the National Institute of Justice. Mexico will likely need to make similarly large investments in the judicial sector and will require a similarly long-term time horizon as it ventures forward.

¹⁰³ At the same time, lawyers were building new standards for professional conduct, including its Model Code of Ethics first developed by the American Bar Association (ABA) in 1969 and used in most states. This code was preceded in 1908 by the Canons of Professional Ethics. An ABA Commission on Evaluation of Professional Standards was first appointed in 1977, and the ABA developed its Model Rules of Professional Conduct in 1983. Only one state, California, does not formally adhere to the model rules, though it does have its own rules of professional conduct. See www.aba.org.

One possible accelerator for Mexico is that many domestic and international organizations have been working actively to assist with the transformation. The National Fund for the Strengthening and Modernization of Justice Promotion (Fondo Nacional para el Fortalecimiento y Modernización de la Impartición de la Justicia, Fondo Jurica) has sponsored the development of a model procedural code and new training programs. Meanwhile, U.S. government agencies and non-governmental professional associations have offered various forms of assistance, including financial assistance and legal training. Notably, the Rule of Law Initiative of the American Bar Association (ABA), the National Center for State Courts and U.S. government-funded consulting agencies, like Management Systems International, have also worked to promote reform and provide training and assistance. From 2007-2008, the Justice in Mexico Project organized a nine-part series of forums hosted in Mexico and the United States in collaboration with the Center for Development Research (Centro de Investigación para el Desarrollo, A. C., CIDAC) to promote analysis and public dialogue about judicial reform.¹⁰⁴

Of critical importance for all of these efforts will be the development of quantitative and qualitative metrics to evaluate the actual performance of the new system. Are cases handled more efficiently by the criminal justice system today than they were in the past? Are all parties satisfied when their cases are handled through mediation? Have police, prosecutors, public defenders and judges demonstrated significant improvements in capacity and service delivery? Does the new criminal justice system adequately prepare convicts (and communities) for their ultimate reintegration into society? Unfortunately, there are few adequate baseline indicators available to answer many of these questions.¹⁰⁵

The enormity of the challenges confronted by Mexico's judicial sector is not to be under-estimated. Mexico is working to make major progress in a relatively short period, attempting to radically alter hundreds of years of a unique, independent legal tradition in less than a decade. The reality is that the reform effort will take decades, will require massive resources and effort, and will involve a great deal of trial and error. Moreover, given the dramatic changes proposed, there may be significant and legitimate resistance to some aspects of the reforms. In working through these issues, Mexico can certainly look to and learn from both the positive and negative experiences of other Latin American countries that have adopted legal reforms in recent years (e.g., Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Honduras and Venezuela). However, like Mexico itself, the Mexican model of criminal justice is quite unique. Any effort to change the Mexican system will undoubtedly develop along its own course, at its own pace and with sometimes unexpected results. In the end, the success of these efforts will rest on the shoulders a new generation of citizens and professionals within the criminal justice system, who will be both the stewards and beneficiaries of Mexico's on-going judicial sector reforms.
